The school takes cognizance that policy making in the Public Service is based on scientific analysis of social, economic, governance issues, and objective, evidence-based formulation of related policies and strategies.

Research at KSG responds to the requirement of continuous learning through discovery of new and innovative ideas for increased creativity and solution of emerging problems. The three dimensions used in the research activities include:

Generation of knowledge in the relevant spheres of public service and national development; the School continues to undertake an increasing number of research works for knowledge that supports policy review and development

Dissemination of knowledge by providing platforms for sharing information, ideas and experiences with stakeholders; through the East African Journal of Public Affairs, occasional paper series, conferences and seminars.

Establishment of Think Tanks to identify, analyze, and evaluate current policy issues and make proposals on policy development and review. Think tanks at the School are formed around a discipline or topical issues that require expert and professional deliberations to inform the way forward.

Research conducted by KSG aims at:

- Inform development or review of policy.
- Provide evidence-based solution to existing problems.
- Enhance innovation.
- Advance epistemology and freedom

OUTREACH

Kenya School of Government has the mandate to facilitate public participation by gathering input from an extensive range of stakeholder interests.

Public participation results in all – embracing views and concerns of the public whilst and providing fair treatment, meaningful involvement and social inclusion for all people regardless of race, color, national origin, sexual orientation or income, with respect to the development, implementation, and decisions made through the public participation process. The School then is obligated to balance among these views and concerns, and reflect the decisions back, so that the public understands how its diverse concerns were considered.
